Excerpt: .at nine o clock; and the guides again made a long delay. They were not over-anxious to bivouac on an unknown waste of snow, as was their employer; and, therefore, they tried to put off their departure until it would be too late to venture, for want of daylight. But De Saussure was firm; he made them start again, and about half-past one they halted, to dine at another rock--the last of the chain. Their appetites were famous; and as they were now 2,000 or 3,000 feet above the line of eternal frost, the guides hit upon an ingenious device to procure water. They made up a great quantity of snowballs, and began to pelt the side of the rock opposed to the sun, and therefore warm. Part of the snow stuck to the rock, and speedily melted; and they soon had a reservoir which...
