October 13th was a wonderfully clear, sunshiny day, in direct contrast to the week preceding, in which it had rained almost every day. As a consequence the sky was dotted with aeroplanes, flying at all heights and in all sorts of formations, and with observation balloons stretching away to the left and right as far as the eye could reach. A wonderful air battle took place almost directly over our gun positions, and within easy view of company headquarters. Four German planes tried to steal over to shoot down the observation balloon just back of headquarters. A barrage was immediately put up, which was dangerous, as there were so many English planes in the vicinity. The Allied machines, however, did not appear to notice the German planes. Antiaircraft guns opened up from hitherto...
